Technically speaking, any user can install a Direct TV satellite dish on the condition that there be a clear view of the southern sky for the dish. All advertising campaigns clearly mention this, therefore consider the aspect carefully before signing a contract for any kind of television programming.

People living in downtown areas in neighborhoods where large buildings block the view of the sky could not be able to get Direct TV satellite signal, and would have to go for the cable option. Pre-subscription tests can be performed in collaboration with the service provider to see whether the location is adequate or not for the installation of a dish. If the home meets the technical requirements you can move on to signing the contract: be aware of the fact that the use of the Direct TV satellite network requires a contract between twelve and twenty four months. Should you end the contract before the term date you will be charged with penalties or cancellation fees.

The direct TV satellite offer comes with two kinds of packages; first there is the standard family programming and then the all-inclusive variant that gives access to premium options for an extra monthly fee. Furthermore, new subscribers are offered no-charge programming for about four months, after which the monthly price mentioned in the contract enters the regular payment scheme. The initial package comes with a free receiver, but in case you need to use a multiple receiver system for an average house, then, extra costs will add on the bill.

The difference between Direct TV satellite provider and its competitor DISH Network is that the former has a more advantageous offer in terms of the equivalence between fees charged and programs offered as part of the package. Other comparison aspects cover the discussion of the equipment necessary, the possible upgrades and the troubles of signal reception during storms or on rainy days. The loss of signal remains one of the most upsetting things users have to reproach to TV satellite providers, and most often all sorts of improvised solutions are applied in order to get a stable service.
